

WHY I AM STILL CONFIDENT IN EMERGING MARKETS

Having lagged this bull market, there's real value in Emerging markets.

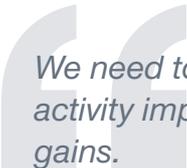

- Economic data is troughing, pointing to a gentle improvement in 2020. With valuations showing few signs of extremes, global equities remain a good option for investors, in our view.
- Emerging markets haven't seen anything like the gains of U.S. equities in recent years. Upside was limited by the slowing global economy and strong U.S. dollar.
- Investors' disenchantment with emerging markets is abnormally high. This is a clear opportunity and our global portfolio is overweight the most compelling segments of the EM universe.

In 2020, investors' face a range of challenges as well as opportunities. Markets are near all-time highs and while bull markets tend to die of extremes or crisis, there are concerns about the age of this particular bull market, especially given the global economy slowed in 2019. Throw in geopolitical concerns over the U.S. election, trade wars and Middle East tensions and it would be easy to lurch toward safe havens.

However, we continue to live in a world with low or negative interest rates and central banks who are proactively stimulating or preparing for stimulus. Economic data is troughing with an outlook of stability to gentle improvement in 2020, and with valuations showing few signs of broad-based extremes, equities remain a good option in my opinion.

We need to see growth and economic activity improve to back up recent market gains.

Economic Data Needs to Catch Up with Markets

Equity investors generally enjoyed strong gains in 2019. The Nasdaq broke through 9,000 for the first time and the S&P 500 recently hit a new all-time high. With equity markets having performed well in the back end of 2019, we now need to see growth and economic activity improve to back up recent market gains. Figure 1 illustrates the gap that has emerged between equity and economic performance.

Of course, equity markets are predictive creatures and tend to look ahead. That said, there's not a lot of room for disappointment and 2020 is going to require some nimble movement in portfolios to tackle the upcoming risks. These include potential earnings disappointment and the sector rotation that may come from unexpected cyclical acceleration or disappointment. I have certainly been reducing a degree of risk within the portfolio and playing for the middle part of the fairway, given the need to maintain a balanced portfolio and account for the mosaic of risk and return opportunities ahead.

Value to Be Found in Emerging Markets

One area where there remains a closer correlation with equity markets and economic data is the emerging world. Emerging markets (EMs) haven't seen anything like the gains that U.S. equities have enjoyed in recent years. Many individual countries have seen positive returns, but upside has been somewhat limited by a slowing global economy and a U.S. dollar that has maintained real strength in good and bad times.

Key to the case for emerging markets over the medium term is a stable economic backdrop and corporate profits lifting returns after a difficult 2019. With valuations across the developed world unlikely to expand further, profits growth is likely to be the main driver of returns this year, and here we are especially encouraged by prospects in the emerging world.

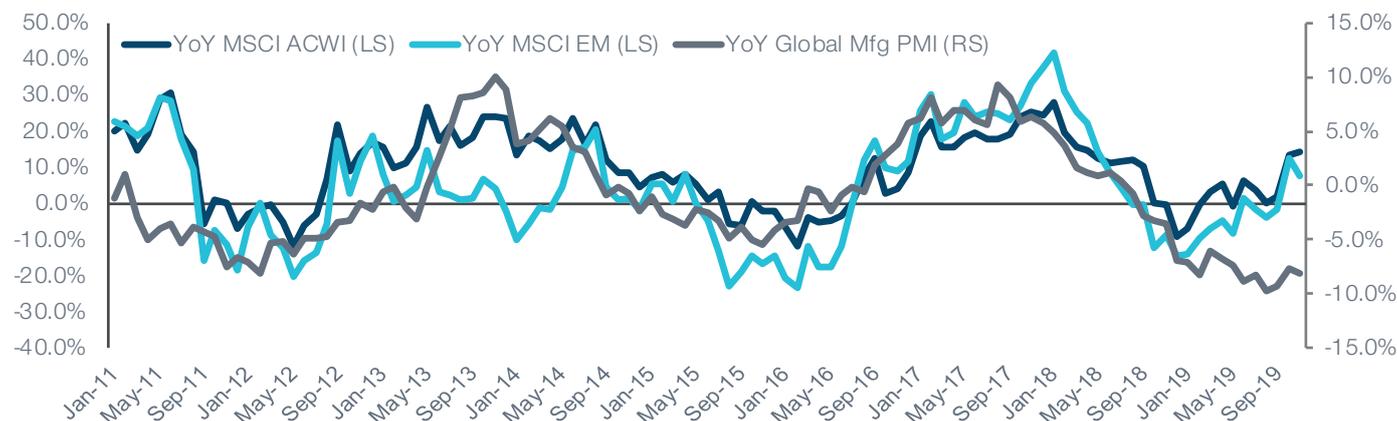

As I have stated before, however, EMs are heterogeneous and to lump them all together in one bucket is not consistent with fundamental reality today. Instead, I tend to use four different classifications when discussing this dynamic part of the world.

The first one is China. China is so large and important that it deserves its own category. Although the Chinese economy has slowed substantially, it is still growing much faster than the developed world. But it faces challenges in its financial system and in transitioning from an investment-driven to a consumer-driven economy, bringing frictions along the way. Our exposure is focused in areas such as the consumer, technology with high-spec intellectual property and growth segments of health care. These are the areas of China that we believe can continue to do well over the long term whether the economy slows or not.

Economic data needs to catch up with equity markets for there not to be a fallout

The next are export-orientated countries, particularly in North Asia (South Korea, Taiwan). These are for all intense purposes developed economies supplying the segments of the technology chain, but due to idiosyncratic reasons, have ended up being classified as emerging. While we see an improvement in the IT capex and semiconductor industry in 2020, we find more opportunity in developed world peers and alternatives, especially given better corporate governance standards for those developed market peers.

The third bucket is commodity-levered economies. Countries including Russia, South Africa, Brazil and those in the Middle East whose economies are primarily driven by the commodity cycle and energy prices. Here we are underweight given our view of a low growth world and our negative outlook for commodities. Within very selective pockets of these economies, we are focused on companies with growth leverage to positive consumer trends and emerging technologies including electronic payments. High-quality balance sheets, low-cost production and better growth profiles remain our compass in tougher neighborhoods. Moving down the quality spectrum is not part of our strategy given the tougher growth backdrop.

With investors disenchantment with emerging markets having become abnormally high in recent years, I see this as a clear opportunity.

Finally, the fourth and most interesting in my opinion, are the demographically-driven areas of EMs. Consumption-driven economies which tend to have growing population's and where citizens are working very hard to make a better life for themselves. Given the favorable growth backdrop this creates, pricing power is more evident, together with positive real interest rates and stable inflation. This creates a fertile environment for traditional banks as well as consumer companies. The five countries that typify this best for me are India, Indonesia, the Philippines, Vietnam and Peru. This is where I continue to find some of our very best ideas for long term investment.

Why Emerging Markets Are a Good Hunting Ground

If we take the example of global consumption (which is fading late in the cycle), one of the remaining growth segments centres on South East Asia, India and China. Outside of sectors like luxury goods, where western companies tend to have the edge, the best way to benefit from structural consumption growth is via domestically focused companies supplying products for local tastes and preferences.

Another example of a positive emerging market growth trend amid a tough global sector backdrop, is banking. In Europe and Japan near zero or negative interest rates persist. We think that makes it very difficult for banks to generate returns. In contrast, banks in India and Indonesia operate in economies with high single-digit interest rates and 10%+ nominal GDP growth, all with expanding consumer debt usage profiles. They also have increased room to grow due to the low customer penetration levels. This enables banks in these areas to potentially deliver much stronger returns.

More generally, as a global investor I like to address the full opportunity set available to me as an active investor. And what I really love is finding stock ideas where there is inefficiency, where the mosaic of fundamentals is complex, and where we have a real fundamental research edge or advantage.

At T. Rowe Price, the fact that we have such experience and so many people in these markets is a huge advantage. In EMs, there is also much more information asymmetry, emotion and fear and greed at play. This means that as a long-term active manager I can create greater alpha for my clients as I can adopt that long-term strategy.

What Happens Next?

At times like these — with above-average valuations, a mature economic cycle and geopolitical uncertainties — investors tend to become increasingly nervous, and market behaviour can become increasingly short term in nature. This is where experience and an ability to see through short-term market movements can become advantageous. With investors disenchantment with emerging markets having become abnormally high in recent years, I see this as a clear opportunity, and that is why I remain overweight to the most compelling segments of the EM world. ■
